

5) Briefly explain how Python's try-catch structure makes programs more robust.

Dealing with errors in Python is done through the use of exceptions that are caught in try blocks and deal with in except blocks. If an error is found, the try block is stopped and transferred down to the except block. You can also use the finally block. The code in the finally block will be executed regardless of whether an exception occurs.